Dynamic processing of glucose by the phytoalexin-activated plant defence system of Arabidopsis. Many plant secondary metabolites play a role in protection against pathogens and insects and are therefore of interest for the development of herbivory-resistant crops. Some plant secondary metabolites may also act as defence signals to the host, triggering a defence reaction in plants. Recently, a class of defence-activating phytochemicals called phytoalexins was discovered. These compounds are produced by plants in response to biotic and abiotic stress, such as wounding, insect feeding and pathogen infection. Using Arabidopsis thaliana, we showed that the phytoalexins salicylic acid and methyl jasmonate are the prime signals for the induction of defence genes of the glucosinolate biosynthesis pathway. However, not all phyto 82157476af
